

Our Turn to Witness

Tragedy unfolds around us, upstaging any invented drama imaginable. With disaster hitting the world in waves, who can say how or when it will end?

So many have endured the unbearable. Others worry what tomorrow brings every day. In life, as in plays, people seldom fathom the scope of suffering until it's nearly over.

What's our role, in times like these? What mirror can we offer? It may take time to feel relevant again—another crushing loss to manage. But relevance isn't exactly relevant now. Is it?

There will be stories to share from this time, shaped by vastly different choreographies. Our work will change, perhaps briefly or forever, and so will we. Our purpose will emerge.

For now, let's play the audience, absorb the story, and get it right. Save analysis for some future time when clarity returns. Now's the time to witness.

Kristin Johnsen-Neshati

(she/her/hers)

April 30th, 2020